"In The Economic Development of Barbados, Michael Howard discusses mainly economic factors influencing Barbadian economic development since World War II. He provides an interpretation of the role of foreign investment and public policy in the development process, within the conceptual framework of institutional structural analysis."--BOOK JACKET. Discusses mainly economic factors influencing Barbadian economic development since the Second World War. This work provides an interpretation of the role of foreign investment and public policy in the development process, within the conceptual framework of institutional structural analysis. The Economic Development of Barbados by the Moyne Commission was based on the expansion of primary output. Belle (1974) advanced the thesis of planter-merchant economic dominance. He argued that even after Barbados's political independence from Britain in 1966, the planter-merchant alliance continued to monopolize the best agricultural land and the distributive trade.
