This book marks the retirement of Donald Harris as Director of the Centre for Socio-Legal Studies at Oxford University, an institution which he helped create, and which he directed for the first twenty-one years of its life. The essays range from an economic analysis of the law, the behaviour of lawyers in the business world, the property and financial consequences of divorce, to current tensions between judges and politicians. All are fused by their achievement in providing a succinct summary of the current state of research while making a considered assessment of future directions. Invoking Human Rights.
